In 1933, the Nazis came to power in Germany. Sophie was only 12 years old at the time, but she was already aware of the dangers that the Nazis posed. She and her brother Hans joined the Hitler Youth, but they quickly became disillusioned with the Nazi ideology.

In 1941, Sophie began studying medicine at the University of Munich. She was one of the few women in her class, and she faced discrimination from both her professors and her fellow students. However, Sophie was determined to succeed, and she graduated from medical school in 1943.

The White Rose

In 1942, Sophie and her brother Hans co-founded the White Rose, a resistance group that opposed the Nazi regime. The White Rose produced and distributed leaflets that criticized the Nazis' policies and called for the overthrow of the regime.

The White Rose was a small group, but its members were very active. They distributed leaflets in public places, and they even painted anti-Nazi slogans on buildings. The Nazis were determined to stop the White Rose, and they eventually succeeded.

In February 1943, Sophie and Hans Scholl were arrested by the Gestapo. They were tried and convicted of treason, and they were executed on February 22, 1943.

Legacy

The White Rose was a small group, but its impact was significant. The group's leaflets helped to spread the word about the Nazis' crimes, and they inspired others to resist the regime.

Sophie Scholl and her brother Hans are remembered as heroes of the German resistance. Their story is a reminder of the power of standing up for what is right, even in the face of danger.
