In the annals of American history, few women have left a more profound mark on the nation's legal system than Sandra Day O'Connor and Ruth Bader Ginsburg. These two extraordinary women shattered glass ceilings, defied stereotypes, and transformed the Supreme Court forever.

Sandra Day O'Connor: The First Woman on the Supreme Court

Sandra Day O'Connor was born in El Paso, Texas, in 1930. From a young age, she exhibited a sharp intellect and a determination to succeed.

Despite facing discrimination as a woman in the male-dominated field of law, O'Connor persisted in her pursuit of a legal career.

After graduating from Stanford Law School, O'Connor worked as a lawyer and politician in Arizona. In 1981, President Ronald Reagan nominated her to the Supreme Court, making her the first woman to serve on the nation's highest court.

As an associate justice, O'Connor quickly established herself as a pragmatic and independent voice. She was known for her ability to bridge the ideological divide between the court's conservative and liberal wings.

O'Connor's most famous opinion was her majority opinion in Planned Parenthood v. Casey (1992), which upheld the right to abortion while also allowing states to impose some restrictions on the procedure.

Ruth Bader Ginsburg: The Notorious RBG

Ruth Bader Ginsburg was born in Brooklyn, New York, in 1933. Like O'Connor, she faced significant challenges as a woman in law. After graduating from Columbia Law School, Ginsburg was denied a clerkship with the Supreme Court because she was a woman.

In 1993, President Bill Clinton nominated Ginsburg to the Supreme Court. She was confirmed and became the second woman to serve on the nation's highest court.

As an associate justice, Ginsburg became known for her sharp intellect, witty dissents, and unwavering commitment to gender equality. She was a vocal advocate for women's rights, civil rights, and LGBTQ rights.
